"Herrings, as far as numbers are concerned, exceed all the rest of the fish in the ocean put tegether. They penetrate to the Polar sea, inaccessible on many accounts to voracious fish, and there breed and multiply beyond the computation of man. It was supposed by Pennant that it two berrings were allowed to live and increase in their characteristic style, and the lives of their off pring spared for twenty-five years, their bodies united would exceed the bulk of the world ten times. An army of them, equaling in extent Italy, France, and Spain, leave the regions of the Pole in the spring. Early in June they surround the Shetland islands; next Stotland, Ireland, and England; they then cross the Atlantic to the coast of Georgia; from thence they move east, and line the entire sea coast of North America, more than three thousand miles in extent, and what is most remarkable, they always keep the same distance from the sun, and never rest, and are always compelled to remain near the surface of the sea, as their air-bladder is too fel y developed, and their fins too broad to permit them to sink deep. We can scarcely conceal our amazement at the number of these fish, when we take into consideration the thousands of millions that are yearly taken throughout the world by fishermen, the tens | the order of this Board, for the repair of Union of thousands of millions destroyed by whales street, which was concurred in. and other marine monsters, that follow them bi ht and day throughout all their migrations; yet, notwithstanding the untiring scral Assembly, authorizing a loan to the Orange tivity of the-e numerous destructive causes, and Alexandria Railroad Company, and for every easuing year finds the abundance undiminished and perfectly inexhaustible, defying the combined arts of men and the irrepressible voracity of all the ocean tribes."
